On motion of C. W. Antrim's Sonst that is king measured the course of th tempt to get possession of him from his self-constituted uncle. The manner in which Yancy delles the law, maintains his rights and conducts himself before the Pine Woods 'squire at a "warrant trying" furnishes pages of the most delilous humor. But the arnt, even of a discriminating law, reaches a little farther, and so Bob Yancy and his ward bid a sorrowful adieu to the sympathetic North Carolina Pine Hillers, and begin a tramp that is to end at the plantation country surrounding Memphis, in Western Tennessec. There they hope to find a safe retreat, and eventually realize their hope. The tramp is prolific in adventure and result. It makes the little lad acquainted with the "Prodigal Judge," whom he first knows as a man who had lost his place and name in the world, but who has never sunk so low as to forget how to be good to the friendless and the orphan. Judge Slocum, Price Turberville, indeed, is a new and striking type in literature, one who shows himself in the hour of weakness and temptation. Beside the judge walks Solemon Mahaffy, gaunt and awkward, yet redeeming much that is untoward in his life by the manner of his death.

As for the Cavendish family, among the book character group, they are incomperable, their life on the raft bringing up thoughts of the purest pleasure. The part they play, little Cavendishes and all, in the rescue of the heroine of the book and Hannibal when these two have fallen into hands of Western outlaws is one of the most thrilling episodes in a romance which is largely made up of such episodes.

a story from the very first, describes people whom it is an education to meet, and introduces these people with an early nineteenth century background—a North Carolina pine country and a West Tennessee setting—to individualize them.

The dramatic power which vitalizes and fuses characters, incidents and surroundings into a natural and inevitable sequence is here a basic force, in evidence on every page. From the beginning, in which the Guintard home is described, with the faded splendors of its great drawing-room, and the dead body of its former master, clad in his Continental uniform, and paid tribute to by a few, old, faithful retainers and pine woods folk, to the climax, in which in the removed below the falls to by a few, old, faithful retainers and pine woods folk, to the climax, in which in the removed below the fails to the days of the strongly setting tide of entigration toward Western Tennessee, and of social life in that region three-quarters of a century ago, when a charming through it. The book period and the country in which the major part of its drama is cacted render it specially rich and varied in its experiences, in the picture it draws of the strongly setting tide of entigration toward Western Tennessee, and of social life in that region three-quarters of a century ago, when half-solvential products the story and the villains who obstruct its course. The latter have to be severely dealt with by the judge before being brought to reason.

The book is modern in taste, ideals, and for that reason is all the more powerful in its prosentation of a romance that might well have become the major part of its drama is concidered in its experiences, in the picture it draws of the strongly setting tide of enigration toward western Tennessee, and of social life in that region the look of the days of chivalry.

Madge Okleston, a charmin

great success, "The Clue," with another detective story that is sure to be one of the most popular in its class. Her plot is worked out in an unusually clever way to a wholly unexpected but thoroughly satisfactory ending.

usually clever way to a wholly unexpected but thoroughly satisfactory ending.

The story is told by the young detective himself, who is much too modest to acknowledge his ability, and who fails at the end by reason of the blindness of love.

Interest is caught at the very beginning by the statement of facts in the case and the finding of a series of conflicting clues. Mr. Joseph Crawford, a wealthy financier and owner of a lovely New Jersey country house, is found murdered in his own home, with a bullet through his temple. The weapon with which the deed was committed is nowhere to be found, but a lady's gold mesh bag, a late "Extra" of the evening before, and several crumpled rose leaves that have fallen to the floor from the basis of a hypothesis. Suspicion points at once to Mr. Crawford's niece-by-marriage. Florence Lloyd. Miss Lloyd is proven to have had a motive in the fact that her uncle strenuously opposed her marriage to his secretary, Gregory Hall, and the night before his murder threatened to cut her off with the traditional shilling unless she broke off the match. The mysterious disappearance of the will further involves ditional shilling unless she broke of the match. The mysterlous disap-pearance of the will further involves matters, and when the detective finally proves that Florence made false state-ments before the coroner's jury, things look black indeed for the young girl. It is just at this point that Burroughs the detective and story-teller, becomes aware of the fact that he would give his life to save Florence Lloyd. He goes to work more frantically than aware of the lact that he would give his life to save Florenee Llovd. He goes to work more frantically than ever and succeeds in proving every single clue to be quite a commonplace coincidence. In despair he sends for his superior, Fleming Stone, who solves the mystery, while Burroughs is engaged in winning Florence over to his way of thinking.

The story is entirely free from the revolting features that so often mar tales of its class; yet it is quite thrilling enough to satisfy the strongest craving for exciting fiction. Moreover, Miss Wells has worked out her plot in a manner that will appeal to a logical mind, and the methods of "deduction" that have strained the reader's credulity to the breaking point so often.

"Dolly Madison" and Book People.
It is an astonishing realization, and one that will interest Richmond friends to know that Mrs. Jane Van Zandt, who went to Washington, D. C. in 18th, as little Jane Cabell, enjoyed Eisle Ferguson's presentment of "Dolly Madison" at the Columbia Theatre in Washington on the evening of March 6. Mrs. Van Zandt was just eleven years old when she met one of the most popular mistresses of the White House. She is probably the last matron of the old Southern school now surviving who can record personal impressions of Mrs. Medison earths here surviving who can record personal im pressions of Mrs. Mådison, and she hadone so in the Washington newspaper. In a very interesting and attractive

Richmond Authors' Work, in the March issue of Book News Monthly there is a literary apprecia-tion of Mary Johnston which everybody will want to read. The March Bookman contains a well illustrated article on "The Sduth in Literature," by Louise Collier Willdox, of Norfolk. Mrs. Kate Langley Bosher is about finishing her new book, and James Branch Cabell's latest novel is to be brought out by Harper. Houghton & Mifflin, of Boston, are publishers for Henry Sydnor Harrison's novel, marking his entrance into the permanent literary field. Altogether, Richmond and Virginia writers are claiming and holding their own in the world of letters.
